Summary Paragraph

The Harlan and Marie Nelson House, built in 1963, is a one story, split level house of steel, glass, aluminum, and brick masonry. It is located at 2785 E. Lancaster Drive in the St. Mary's neighborhood of Salt Lake City, Utah. The style is strictly International style with distinctive features such as an irregularly-shaped hexagonal roof with prominent roof steel members, walls of glass, an open floor plan in the gathering spaces around a central hearth, and a sunken den on the garden level. The house was designed by Salt Lake City-based architect Eduard Dreier for the Nelsons. The foundation is concrete and the roof is asphalt shingled. The supporting structure for the house is steel, with oversized exposed members along the roofline and revealed supporting posts. Walls are a combination of glass, plywood, and cream brick. The house features a carport and a garden level basement. As the house has been in one family's ownership, there have been minor modifications to the exterior and interior. In 1991, Dreier designed a small rear addition within the existing roofline to enlarge a bathroom and expand the dining room slab over a non-functioning planter. There have also been minor alterations to bathrooms and the kitchen. The house is placed on a site that steeply rises from the intersection of Lancaster and Canterbury drives, resting nearest to the southeast property line. A northwest orientation fixes the main rooms and roofline toward a view of downtown Salt Lake City and the Great Salt Lake. The building is surrounded by lawn, mature plantings, and a fenced rear and side yards. There is one small contributing original outbuilding on the property that is used as a garden shed. The Nelson House has excellent integrity in all seven qualities and is a distinctly contributing historic resource in the St. Mary's neighborhood and Salt Lake City.

Narrative Description

Exterior

The footprint of the Nelson House is rectangular with an irregular and angled extension on the north and west sides. The footprint roughly measures 100 feet by 70 feet and sits underneath an irregularly-shaped hexagonal roof. The roofline has two drainage slopes from a center structural beam to the northeast and southwest. Due to the slope of the site, the entire roof visually appears to also slope from a high point at the northwest, which points to downtown Salt Lake City, down to the southeast, however, it is actually at a flat grade. The structural expression of steel, with large beams dominating the roofline, provide a heavy feeling and horizontality. The underside of the roof is sheathed in plywood that extends into the interior ceiling. The foundation is concrete with footings that extend beyond the basement walls. Exterior sheathing is mixed on each façade, primarily utilizing glass, plywood, and cream brick. Most of the northeast elevation is devoted to glass, divided by a grid. There is a single, irregularly shaped, cream brick chimney that is nearly centered on the roof that serves two fireplaces.

The southwest elevation is considered the primary elevation as it faces Lancaster Drive, and includes the front entry and wall opening to the side entry. The elevation is deeply recessed underneath the roofline, which extends further out to form a two-car width carport. A brick wall in running bond forms the lower two-thirds of the elevation and extends in each direction from underneath the roof, forming structural screening walls. The upper course of brick is in header bond. The upper one-third of the elevation is a series of windows divided into an even fenestration pattern. The entryway is composed of a set of matching wood double doors. The character of the doors stands out due to their height, which is the full ten-foot height of the elevation, and their decorative hardware with oversized knobs.

The northwest elevation is visually the most prominent of the facades, though it is largely obscured from public view by mature vegetation along Canterbury Drive. Due to the sloping site landscape and angled underside of the roof, the roof appears to angle upward at this elevation. The large steel beams that form the roof supports join prominently at the center of the northwest elevation, creating a wide overhang for the glass and plywood exterior wall. The overhang is supported by a steel beam. The central portion of the wall is sheathed in plywood. The north half is composed of an irregular fenestration pattern of large and small windows that extend from the ground to the roof, and a horizontal concrete wall. Behind this section is the dining room, master bedroom, and a basement bedroom. The west half is composed of a series of equally-spaced large windows and a sliding glass doorway that extend from the ground to the roof. The doorway serves as an access between the music room/living room to a concrete patio. The northwest elevation wall is stepped back on the north half and angled back on the west half, taking advantage of shading and weather protection afforded by the wide overhang.

The southeast elevation faces the side yard and its appearance retains its original integrity. Brick walls at the corners bracket a centrally-located porch that extends out from the kitchen. The porch is covered by the angled roofline, and while on grade with the rear yard, can be reached through the main façade wall opening and a series of floating aggregate concrete steps. A large series of windows and the door opening, with an evenly-divided fenestration pattern, compose the central wall of the southeast elevation. The doorway and the corner that separates the living room from kitchen are both sheathed in plywood.

County and State

The northeast elevation is the rear of the house and faces a rear yard of grass. At the northeast corner, a concrete wing wall extends from the northwest facade into the yard about ten feet and down under the ground as a foundation footing. The center portion of the original northeast (rear) elevation was extended out in 1991 and is sheathed in travertine square tiles and glass block. The southeast corner, including original brick wall and a louvered window, remain intact.

Interior

On the interior, the Nelson House has 3,502 square feet of space divided between three levels. The ground level includes an undivided living room and music room. The upper level includes a dining room adjacent and open to the ground level, a master bedroom with adjacent master bathroom, kitchen, second full bathroom, and a den (originally a bedroom). The lower level, which is a garden level basement, includes a large den with sunken library that is open to the ground level, and separate laundry room, two bathrooms, utility/storage room, and two bedrooms. The fireplaces are located in the living room/music room and in the sunken library. The main entry is into the living room/music room. A set of split-level stairs is located in-line with the front door, providing access to all levels.

The music room is central to the house, from which all activity and sound flows. The acoustics of the house were designed to carry sound throughout the common spaces, as music was a daily occurrence for the Nelson family. Given that the house is surrounded by walls of windows, natural light is plentiful in every room on the ground and upper levels. The central stairway is a series of floating steps that match the exterior side yard steps, but on the interior are covered with carpeting. The interior ceiling follows the angle of the roofline, giving volume to the gathering spaces and the master bedroom. The ceiling majority of the ceilings are covered with the same plywood that extends from the underside of the exterior roof, blurring the inside and outside spaces through the large windows. The design intent for the living room was focused on entertaining. It is centered around a floor-to-ceiling height, hammered bronze fireplace that is placed at an angle, and a custom-designed table by the architect Eduard Dreier sits at the center of the room. The music room is directly adjacent to the living room, and modestly separated by a series of custom-designed case goods. The case goods unit include a series of cabinets, shelves, and a coat closet in a light pine that match the front door. Flooring throughout is carpet and Saltillo tile, which matches the original materials, though some of the tile has been covered.

The main gathering spaces on the garden level are the office/den and sunken library. The den was modified in 1991 with the addition of shelving along the planter for use as an office area. The sunken library is in original condition with walls sheathed in horizontally-placed light pine wood, and features a stone fireplace, built-in seating, and book shelving. The bedrooms have varying degrees of original built-ins including closets and one has a desk and shelving.

Renovations have been made to the bathrooms, however they maintain their original footprint. The master bathroom was enlarged in 1991 to allow for a separate shower and tub, and included an adjacent larger closet. The kitchen has been modernized with new cabinets, countertops, and appliances, but retains its original configuration and full height, including an original ceiling notch where the roof slopes intersect.

Setting and Outbuilding

The Nelson House sits along the southeast property line of an irregularly shaped, curved parcel of 0.58 acres. There is a long driveway at the south edge of the property that leads under the carport. Views of the northwest elevation are obscured by the mature foliage along the northwest property line. Many of the trees and shrubs are likely remnants of the original landscaping. Flowerbeds are lined along the southwest side of the house and along the driveway, however, the rear yard is strictly grass. A concrete wall and stone steps provide a break in the grade change of the side yard to prevent an unnavigable slope. A yard shed, also constructed in 1963, is the only outbuilding on the property and is located in the side yard. It is obscured from public view behind the brick wall extension of the southwest elevation, which it is also tied into through its walls. The outbuilding has a flat roof and is constructed of cream brick side walls and a plywood front that has two sets of double doors. The building is in original condition and therefore is a contributing structure.

The Nelson House has had only minor modifications since the original construction in 1963. The property has excellent integrity in the qualities of location, setting, design, workmanship, materials, feeling and association with the architect Eduard Dreier.

With home construction concentrated in the 1960s and 1970s, the neighborhoods of Oak Hills and St. Mary's have a rare and interspersed collection of modern-style homes that were designed by Utah's modern architects. These designs range from glass-and-steel construction to organically designed ramblers that display Utah's natural materials. Many have extensive attention to detail and solid construction, giving them a timeless appeal. The Nelson House stands out as a contributing building in the St. Mary's neighborhood.

Statement of Significance Summary Paragraph (Provide a summary paragraph that includes level of significance, applicable criteria, justification for the period of significance, and any applicable criteria considerations.)

The Harlan and Marie Nelson House, built in 1963, is locally significant under Criterion C in the area of Architecture. The house was designed by the Salt Lake City-based architect Eduard Dreier, and Marie Nelson lived here between 1963 and her death in 2018. The period of significance is 1963, the year the house was constructed. Eduard Dreier was a prolific residential architect with a relatively short career. The Nelson House is unique among Dreier's work inasmuch as the house is defined by its irregular hexagonal roof and location and orientation on the site. Dreier designed several International style houses with open floor plans and integrated indoor-outdoor spaces through walls of glass. The floor plan for the Nelson House is unique in that the main rooms of the house are oriented around the grand piano and was acoustically designed to carry music throughout the house. As the property has remained in the original family's ownership, it is exceptionally well-preserved as an example of mid-century domestic architecture and contributes to the historic character of the St. Mary's neighborhood in Salt Lake City.

Narrative Statement of Significance (Provide at least one paragraph for each area of significance.)

Architectural Significance (Criterion C)

The Harlan and Marie Nelson House is architecturally significant under Criterion C as a unique variation of the International style. The house was built in 1963 during the suburban building boom in the Salt Lake City neighborhood of St. Mary's, which climbs the east bench of the Wasatch Mountains. More than the California Ranch or other common house styles of the period, popularity of the International style was inherent on unique clients as they were particularly suited for unique lifestyles. A few architects in Utah practiced strictly in the International style – Ed Dreier, Stephen Macdonald, Ron Molen, John Sugden, and Dee Wilson – and were successful in serving an interested, passionate, and often affluent clientele. Dreier, who started working in Utah in 1956, strictly followed the Miesian design principle of externally expressing the structural system as a key characteristic of his work on custom-designed residential structures.

Harlan Nelson's success in opening IBM's Ogden office and being one of its top national salesmen, allowed the family to move back to Salt Lake City in 1956 for new opportunities. One of those was to build an ideal family home, for which they hired architect Ed Dreier to design. Key factors for designing into the home were their four children and Marie Nelson's love of music, especially the piano. The new house would be designed around the grand piano location at the front of the house surrounded by common areas, with five bedrooms and the kitchen in more private areas. The music room is where Marie Nelson Bennett composed for over sixty years.

Architect Eduard Rudolf Dreier was one of the few Utah architects whose designs were primarily in the International style with heavy influence from Mies van der Rohe and the Bauhaus. Born in Bern, Switzerland, in 1926, Dreier attended architecture school and worked at prominent firms in Zurich, Switzerland, before he immigrated to the United States in June 1949. After arriving in Utah with his parents, he worked with local firms Ware & McClenahan and Woods & Woods. By 1952, Dreier had started his own practice. After declining an opportunity to work with Oscar Niemeyer to design the new capital at Brasilia in the late 1950s to care for his aging parents, Dreier began to rebuild his clientele about 1960.

Dreier specialized in residential design, a niche in Salt Lake City that was only occupied by one other architect (John Sugden). While each of his designs was custom designed for his client, many of them have similar external structural expression. The George and Ellen Furgis House was listed in the National Register of Historic Places in 2015 (NRIS #15000399) as an outstanding example of an International style Miesian residence that retained its original interior and exterior.

Nelson, Harlan and Marie, House

Consistent with the Furgis House, the Nelson House was less formally designed in the International style, especially with respect to adherence to strict Miesian design. Prior to construction of the Nelson House, Dreier's residential designs exhibited rectangular massing, occasionally with intersecting or overlapping masses, and flat roofs. The Nelson House broke with that tradition for the first time with the large hexagonal roof that cantilevers in three directions to create the carport and two patios. Beginning in 1960 with the Pace House, Dreier began utilizing heavier and larger steel beams in external structural expression. The Nelson House was the second such house where that expression was exhibited, and Dreier went on after 1963 to define his designs by these external heavy steel beams.

While the earliest (1952-53) Dreier-designed houses utilized wood as an exterior material, he moved away from that to a very strict adherence to only steel and glass. In 1961 with the Ringholz House, Dreier utilized large rock with pink hue for walls that break up glass wall sections. Dreier continued to use rock walls, both on exterior and interior, in dozens of designs throughout his design career, becoming a signature feature of his residences. The Nelson House utilizes rock on the fireplace in the sunken library in the basement. Dreier returned to utilizing wood (plywood) in small sections on the exterior with the Ennis House in 1962. The design for the Nelson House shows an evolution on Dreier's designs as far as a mix of materials, where he utilized plywood in larger sections, as well as on the outbuilding, but brought in cream brick as a structural and decorative material for the first time.

Construction on the Nelson House was completed in 1963. The Nelsons resided in the house from the time of its completion in 1963 until Marie Nelson Bennett's passing in 2018. Ownership of the house transferred to Bennett's daughter, Metta Driscoll, who continues the family legacy of residence and stewardship.

Additional Historic Context

Harlan Nelson and Marie Louise Barker Nelson Bennett

Marie Barker was born in 1926 and was raised in Salt Lake City. Her mother, Virginia Freeze Barker, was a professional soprano and kept little Marie near the piano as she practiced. She attended East High School where she was active in music, drama, and won the doubles tennis state championship with her twin sister Marilyn. Barker graduated from the University of Utah with a B.A. in Music in 1947. Very active at university, Barker was in Kappa Kappa Gamma, played tennis with Marilyn, and was recognized with honors in the Beehive Honor Society (also with Marilyn) and Phi Kappa Beta. Barker wrote a new song for the start of the 1945 football season titled "Utah, Utah" and in 1947 was named the university spirit leader.

Barker's goal was to become a music composer. At this time, there were few serious women composers in America. Although she felt accepted in Utah's music community, she was intimidated as a woman composer. To avoid potential bias, Barker submitted her music under a male pseudonym, David Rose, to a competition. However, she was not intent on changing the politics of gender on the course of her work, only writing the highest quality music that she could.

That's why Barker enrolled at Yale. After a difficult entry process, she studied under famed German professor and composer Paul Hindemith, graduating in two years instead of the normal four, in 1949. Upon returning to Salt Lake City, Barker taught piano and composition at The McCune School of Music and Art. She became active in the Alpha Dorian Society, eventually becoming its president, performed publicly several times, and in 1951, composed Wasatch Breezes, a string quartet that she considered to be a masterpiece.

In December 1950, Marie Barker wed Harlan Nelson, who was a student at the University of Utah at the time. The couple lived in Ogden in 1952-1956 and began having their four children. Upon returning to Salt Lake City they lived in the high Avenues and Marie Nelson became active in many community organizations including the Junior League, Kappa Kappa Gamma Alumnae, and the Dorian Fine Arts Club. She composed an opera titled "The Telephone" to present to the Junior League in 1962.

The family moved into their Ed Dreier-designed house in late 1963, where Nelson continued to compose in her new music room. In 1965, she created music for a KUED children's show, and then created a series of five musical plays for Pioneer Children's Theater between 1968-1972. All the Nelson children played small roles in these performances.

Daughter Jan was the nearest of the children to being Marie's protégé. At the age of two, Jan was able to sing many songs and by the time she was five was creating four-part harmonies. When she was nine years old, Jan was the first Utahn to win first prize in the National Junior Composers Contest of the National Federation of Music Clubs in 1964. In addition, she won recognition in the National Junior Keynotes Magazine and had superior ratings in Utah Federation of Music Clubs annual festivals as a member of the Marie Barker Nelson Club.

In 1973, when all the children were enrolled in school full time, a forty seven-year old Nelson told the family that she wanted to return to school with the goal of receiving a Ph.D. in composition. In 1977, she had her first composition performed by the Utah Symphony, titled "The Medead." Nelson received her Ph.D. in 1980 from the University of Utah.

Successive tragedies hit the family in 1981. Daughter Jan was struck and killed by a drunk driver in an auto accident, and then less than a month later, Harlan Nelson was hiking, suffered heart failure, and died. Meeting the overwhelming grief head on, Nelson stepped in to run the family's Travelodge business, which included four motels in Utah. Nelson was appointed to the Salt Palace Convention Center board in 1982. But she never stopped composing, many days waking at 5:00 a.m. to get in two hours before working with the motels.

In 1994, the composer Marie Nelson was "discovered." As Nelson has recanted the story, it was late one evening when the phone rang and on the other end was William Thomas McKinley, noted composer from Boston. They talked about music and he asked her to send him what she

Name of Property

Salt Lake County, Utah
County and State

considered to be her best works. McKinley was duly impressed, professing that he had “discovered a major voice in American composers” and asked her to write a new symphony that would be premiered in New York City. Nelson completed the work on time and McKinley followed through to host the premier, but to mentor and shepherd many of Nelson’s works through to public performance and recording.

In 2003, Marie Nelson married Wallace Grant Bennett.

Over the years, Marie Nelson Bennett composed seven musical plays, eight symphonies, five concertos, an opera, and numerous songs and sonatas for various instruments. The Utah

Symphony performed three of her works and she had three New York City premiers. Orchestras that have premiered or recorded her works include the London Symphony, Prague Symphony, Slovak Radio Symphony, Czech Radio Symphony, New York Chamber Orchestra, Concordia, Seattle Symphony, Boston Modern Orchestra, Utah Symphony, Salt Lake Symphony, Whatcom Orchestra, the Paradigm Chamber Orchestra and the Artemis Chamber orchestra. Conductors include Gerard Schwarz, Marin Alsop, Joseph Silverstein, Roger Briggs, Gil Rose, David Cho, Joel Rosenberg, and Harold Rosenbaum.

She was nominated for the Kennedy Center Friedham award for orchestral composition in 1995 and in 1996 received a Merit of Honor award from the University of Utah Emeritus Alumni Association. Bennett submitted her 2010 opera “Orpheus Lex” – twenty years in the making – for a Pulitzer Prize and received the Governor’s Medal in Arts award in 2013. Her works are held in a special collection at the University of Utah.

The value of music was instilled in Bennett from the time she was born. As evidence of the pervasiveness of music in the house of her youth, her brother Richard went into music, eventually heading the music department at Provo High School and composing symphonies. Bennett filled her life, her family’s life, and the lives of countless others with the joy of music. Much of this music, including that which was composed during her prolific post-Ph.D. career, was created in the house at 2785 Lancaster Drive. The music room that so aptly filled a family’s house and life with Bennett’s compositional prowess, extended beyond the walls of the house to performances and recordings that occurred internationally, leaving a tremendous legacy and lasting impact.

Harlan Nelson was born in 1925 to Stanley and Florence Nelson in Rochester, Utah (Emery County). He served in the Navy during World War II for 3 ½ years. After graduating from the University of Utah in 1951, he was employed by IBM in Ogden, worked several years at Friden, and then started in the motel industry. He eventually owned four motels including several by Travelodge. Harlan served as president of the Utah Ski Association, president of the Salt Lake Hotel-Motel Association, and was a founding member of the board and later president of the Salt Lake Convention and Visitor’s Bureau. Nelson was an avid golfer, fisherman, hunter, and outdoorsman, as well as a member of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. Harlan Nelson suffered heart failure while hiking in May 1981 and passed away unexpectedly.
